INTEREST OF *AMICI CURIAE*¹

Amici Curiae comprise a group of civil rights and human rights organizations from around the Nation, including those that represent or advocate on behalf of people whose constitutional rights have been violated by public and private actors. Despite their diverse views and work, Amici have joined together to urge the Court to consider the broader impact this decision might have on civil rights litigation generally. Amici urge the Court not to limit the ability of individual plaintiffs to assert their civil rights in litigation against the officials ultimately responsible for setting unconstitutional policies or condoning unconstitutional acts.²

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Supreme Court should affirm the decision of the Second Circuit and reject Petitioners' position that a heightened pleading standard applies in situations in which plaintiffs seek to hold accountable "high-ranking" officials. The Second Circuit properly applied the holding of Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 127

S.Ct. 1955 (2007), to require that pleadings meet a “plausibility” standard. Only once that plausibility standard had been met should a court allow “carefully limited and tightly controlled discovery by the Plaintiff as to certain officials.” Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 178 (2d Cir. 2007).

The standard articulated by the Second Circuit properly balances the interests of plaintiffs and government defendants in civil rights cases. Certainly, there is a public interest in efficient government, and government officials deserve protection from needless discovery and suit. Yet the very reason supervisory officials are more vulnerable to suit – namely, that their decisions have a far greater impact than frontline officers – also indicates a stronger public interest in holding them accountable in those instances in which they engage in unconstitutional behavior. The “plausibility” standard for construing Bell Atlantic employed by the Second Circuit provides effective guidance in balancing these two public interests – for efficient government on one hand and the rule of law on the other.

By contrast, the standard proposed by Petitioners would overprotect defendants while undervaluing the constitutional rights of plaintiffs and degrading the rule of law. Petitioners’ position would effectively impose higher factual requirements on plaintiffs in qualified immunity cases through judicial action rather than by amendment of the Federal Rules, something this Court has specifically cautioned against. By seeking to take away the district courts’ ability to prescribe even “phased” or “limited” discovery, see Pet’r Br. at 24-25, Petitioners’ recommended interpretation of Bell Atlantic would require many civil rights plaintiffs to plead the very facts that they could not learn until the discovery phase. Perpetrators of civil rights violations rarely articulate their motives to their victims. This is particularly true in the instance of supervisory officials who set unconstitutional policies or who condone their inferiors’ violations. Such policies are typically kept far from public view and behind a veil of silence. It is precisely in those cases that the public interest in judicial scrutiny is the strongest, to vindicate individual rights and to preserve the rule of law. And those interests do not wane in times of national emergency.

The adoption of Petitioners’ position would have wide-reaching ramifications far beyond the “war on terror.” As the cases described below illustrate, many worthy civil rights plaintiffs must rely on the discovery process to uncover concrete evidence that the defendant directed their mistreatment with an unconstitutional motive or deliberate indifference. Under the Second Circuit’s standard in Bell Atlantic, once plaintiffs have afforded defendants full notice of plausible allegations against them, plaintiffs would have access to carefully limited judicially controlled discovery to substantiate their allegations of unconstitutionally motivated mistreatment. Under Petitioners’ proposed standard, by contrast, many plaintiffs whose constitutional rights have been violated by biased or unlawful police investigations, police brutality or race or sex discrimination would be bluntly denied both discovery and redress. The plaintiffs profiled in this brief represent only some of the wide range of civil rights victims who would be denied justice under the artificially high pleading standard proposed by the Petitioners.

ARGUMENT

Javaid Iqbal was one of hundreds of Arab, Muslim, and South Asian immigrants in the New York area arrested because of their ethnicity and religion in an arbitrary and heavy handed dragnet after the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. Neither Mr. Iqbal, nor any of the other men arrested in this dragnet were ever convicted of any crime relating to terrorism, nor has the government presented any evidence that any of the men posed a threat to national security. Nina Bernstein, Held in 9/11 Net, Muslims Return to Accuse U.S., N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 23, 2006 at 1. Yet, like Mr. Iqbal, many of these immigrants suffered horrific abuse during their detention. The verbal, physical and sexual abuses suffered by Mr. Iqbal were not isolated incidents, but rather part of a pattern of government abuses against Muslims following the attacks of September 11. A report by the Office of the Inspector General observed that the pattern of abuse was likely not the product of coincidence, but rather a policy authorized at the highest levels of the federal government. Resp't Br. at 4-5.

By adopting a “plausibility” standard, the Second Circuit struck the right balance between Iqbal’s litigation interests and protecting Defendants from improper liability and vexatious, needless discovery. In his complaint, Mr. Iqbal alleged that Petitioners, former Attorney General John D. Ashcroft and current Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (“FBI”) Robert Mueller crafted, approved, and directed, “as a matter of policy” that detainees would be confined in the ADMAX SHU solely because of membership in protected classes. Pet’r App. 172a-173a (Compl. ¶¶ 96-97). Yet despite those straight-forward pleadings, the OIG Report’s concrete conclusions and the Second Circuit’s carefully staged discovery plan, Petitioners argue that the Second Circuit’s opinion was a “mistake . . . under the now-discredited ‘no set of facts’ pleading-standard regime.” Pet’r Br. at 26. Petitioners do not refer to their interpretation of Bell Atlantic as a “heightened” pleading standard, and admit that this Court rejected the notion that Bell Atlantic imposed a “heightened” standard. See Pet’r Br. at 25 (quoting Bell Atlantic, 127 S.Ct. at 1973 n. 14). But Petitioners’ proposed rule would impose an impossible “Catch-22” on civil rights plaintiffs, by demanding that they plead what they could not yet know. As demonstrated below, were this Court to accept Petitioners’ position, civil rights plaintiffs would be required to plead in advance specific facts regarding the actions of government officials that they could only reasonably learn upon later discovery. By putting the cart before the horse, such a rule disrupts the proper balance between plaintiffs' and defendants' rights and offends the rule of law.

I. The Second Circuit Opinion Properly Interpreted Precedent, Respected the Discretion of District Courts, and Fairly Balanced the Constitutional Rights of Plaintiffs with the Immunity Interests of Government Officials.

The Second Circuit articulated an accurate, straightforward and fair interpretation of Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007) that reconciled that case's holding with Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993) and Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998). As the Second Circuit noted, "[c]onsiderable uncertainty concerning the standard for assessing the adequacy of pleadings has recently been created by the Supreme Court's decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly." Iqbal, 490 F.3d at 155. After careful consideration of the factors mentioned in Bell Atlantic, the Second Circuit held that the Supreme Court "is not requiring a universal standard of heightened fact pleading, but is instead requiring a flexible 'plausibility standard,' which obliges a pleader to amplify a claim with some factual allegations in those contexts where such amplification is needed to render the claim plausible." Id. at 157-58. The court rejected a "universal standard of heightened fact pleading" and embraced a "flexible plausibility standard," striking a fair balance between plaintiffs' interests in remedying violations of their constitutional rights and protecting government officials from vexatious and frivolous lawsuits. Iqbal, 490 F.3d at 157.

In reaching that compromise, the Second Circuit recognized that district court judges are well suited to supervise limited discovery. The Supreme Court has long relied upon district courts to exercise their “discretion in a way that protects the substance of the qualified immunity defense . . . so that officials are not subjected to unnecessary and burdensome discovery or trial proceedings.” Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 597-98. In doing so, “the Court in Crawford-El was careful to distinguish between the D.C. Circuit’s solution to protect government officials from insubstantial claims, which it rejected, and the options otherwise available under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for federal trial judges to deal with this concern.” Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 915 (10th Cir. 2001); see also Rippy v. Hattaway, 270 F.3d 416, 426-27 (6th Cir. 2001) (Gilman, J., concurring) (distinguishing between “circuit-created” rules of heightened pleading and the options available to district courts to “weed out unmeritorious claims” pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure); Cowen v. Bank United of Texas, FSB, 70 F.3d 937, 944 (7th Cir. 1995) (internal citations omitted) (“[C]ontrolling the pace and scope of discovery, being a matter of case management rather than of the application of hard and fast rules, is also within the district judge’s discretion.”); State of Ariz. v. Manypenny, 672 F.2d 761 (9th Cir. 1982) (Kennedy, J.) (“The firing point of the legal system is with the trial judge who is best situated to administer the law and protect the rights of all.”).

In accordance with those principles, the Second Circuit upheld Judge Gleeson’s authorization of “carefully limited and tightly controlled discovery by the Plaintiff as to certain officials.” Iqbal, 490 F.3d at 178. Such structured discovery vindicates the purpose of qualified immunity and is well within the traditional competencies of district court judges. Id. The Second Circuit recognized that victims of constitutional violations often face serious and perhaps insurmountable challenges in pleading detailed, fact specific allegations in the absence of information controlled by the very government officials accused of constitutional violations. “[D]iscovery by the Plaintiff as to certain officials will be appropriate to probe such matters at the Defendants’ personal involvement in several of the alleged deprivations of rights.” Id. at 178. Imposing a heightened pleading standard in such situations would pose unjustified obstacles to uncovering evidence of discrimination in an opaque bureaucracy.

Petitioners propose replacing the Second Circuit’s deference to a district court’s traditional case management powers with a new rule that would strip away many of those powers. Petitioners begin by citing Bell Atlantic’s disavowal of the “no set of facts” standard in favor of a “plausible liability” standard. See Pet’r Br. at 23. To satisfy this new standard, according to Petitioners, plaintiffs must plead “sufficient ‘factual matter’ to ‘raise a right to relief above the speculative level’ and to ‘raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of’ illegal activity.” Id. (citing Bell Atlantic, 127 S.Ct. at 1965). However, while seeking to impose a new requirement for “factual matter” and “factually suggestive” allegations, the Petitioners also seek to revoke the ability of district courts to engage in “careful case management” and “‘phased’ or ‘limited’ discovery.” Pet’r Br. at 24-25.

Moreover, Petitioners’ attempt to alter the pleading standard via the courts rather than through changes to the Federal Rules goes completely against this Court’s own precedents regarding rule-making authority. See, e.g., Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 515 (2002) (“A requirement of greater specificity for particular claims is a result that ‘must be obtained by the process of amending the Federal Rules, and not by judicial interpretation.’”) (quoting Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 168 (1993)). Petitioners themselves note that in Bell Atlantic this court explicitly rejected the notion that the pleading standard was being changed and acknowledged that it could be changed only by amending the Federal Rules. See Pet’r Br. at 25 (citing Bell Atlantic, 127 S.Ct. at 1973 n. 14). Yet while Petitioners may take pains to avoid characterizing it as such, their position on the impact of Bell Atlantic represents a radical change to pleading standards and to the conduct of litigation in federal courts.

The Petitioners' proposed pleading standard would create a "Catch-22" for civil rights and human rights plaintiffs: they would be required to plead specific facts that they could not possibly know without discovery in order to be allowed to proceed with discovery. Allowing phased discovery avoids this injustice, which is why the Second Circuit's interpretation of Bell Atlantic is correct.³ Were this Court to adopt Petitioners' interpretation, then only in the rarest of cases where a "smoking gun" was already a publicly-known fact would a plaintiff have any possibility of surviving the pleading standard. See, e.g., Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39 (1st Cir. 2004) (rejecting dismissal on qualified immunity grounds in a case where wrongdoing had been previously established by a Congressional investigation). A misbehaving supervisory official could play a "head's I win, tail's you lose game" by concealing his wrongdoing, then avoiding discovery into it by invoking Petitioners' higher pleading standard. This Court should not accept Petitioners' invitation to create unnecessary and unjust obstacles to civil rights plaintiffs.

³ A number of other circuits have adopted a post-Bell Atlantic approach to discovery that is very similar to the Second Circuit's approach in this case. Like the Second Circuit, these other circuits interpret Bell Atlantic's requirement that "factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level," Bell Atlantic, 127 S.Ct. at 1965, to mean that a complaint must create a reasonable expectation that discovery would reveal additional evidence. For example, in Watts v. Fla. Int'l. Univ., the Eleventh Circuit said, "[t]he Court has instructed us that [Bell Atlantic] 'does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage,' but instead 'simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of' the necessary element. . . . It is sufficient if the complaint succeeds in 'identifying facts that are suggestive enough to render the element plausible.'" Watts v. Fla. Int'l. Univ., 495 F.3d 1289, 1295-96 (11th Cir. 2007) (quoting Bell Atlantic, 127 S.Ct. at 1965); see also Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 234 (3rd Cir. 2008) ("The Supreme Court's Twombly formulation of the pleading standard . . . does not 'impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage,' but instead 'simply calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of' the necessary element") (citing Bell Atlantic, 127 S.Ct. at 1965); Lindsay v. Yates, 498 F.3d 434, 440 (6th Cir. 2007) (citing Bell Atlantic's requirement of a "reasonably founded hope that the discovery process will reveal relevant evidence" to reverse dismissal of claim); Khorrami v. Rolince, 539 F.3d 782, 788 (7th Cir. 2008) ("... nothing in [Bell Atlantic] suggests that Khorrami's

II. Neither National Security Nor "High-Ranking Officials" Justify Special Pleading Rules.

Invoking our national tragedy, Petitioners argue that civil rights complaints against "high-ranking" officials should face a heightened standard of pleading. Yet there is simply no principled distinction to be made among supervisory officials without sacrificing core democratic principles. Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478, 506 (1978) (internal citations omitted) ("No complaint is inadequate. . . . Khorrami's allegations about Rolince's knowledge are plausible, and only discovery will show whether they are correct. Whether Rolince in fact was aware, unaware, or reckless has yet to be shown, but those facts need not be pleaded in the complaint.").

man in this country is so high that he is above the law. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance with impunity.”). Moreover, civil actions brought pursuant to Title 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and its judge-made cousin, Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971), represent an important mechanism through which constitutional norms are elaborated and enforced. Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. v. Meyer, 510 U.S. 471, 485 (1994) (“[T]he purpose of Bivens is to deter the [federal] officer from infringing individuals’ constitutional rights.”). By shielding supervisory officials from suit, Petitioners’ rule would significantly undermine the necessary deterrent effect of civil rights suits and the rule of law.

Petitioners fail to adequately address the question of when their proposed heightened pleading standard would apply. Petitioners repeatedly cite the “national-security crisis” faced by this Nation and imply that government officials responding to this crisis should be protected from accountability for their constitutional violations by a heightened pleading standard.⁴ Petitioners seem to imply that during national security crises, constitutional protections should be weakened by the imposition of a heightened pleading standard upon civil rights complaints. Yet as observed by the Second Circuit, “the exigent circumstances of the post-9/11 context do not diminish the Plaintiff's right not to be needlessly harassed and mistreated by repeated strip and body-cavity searches." Iqbal, 490 F.3d at 150-60. Moreover, the Petitioners do not explain when such a heightened pleading standard would be triggered.

Petitioners fail to articulate limiting principles because there is no clear limit to the exceptions they would create. There cannot be one special pleading standard applied to "high" government officials during "extraordinary" times and another applied to "low" government officials during "ordinary" times. Such exceptions would swallow the rule. As the Court has recently held, "[t]he laws and Constitution are designed to survive, and remain in force, in extraordinary times." Boumediene v. Bush, 128 S.Ct. 2229, 2277 (2008).

The roundup of Mr. Iqbal and other Muslims following the September 11th attacks is but the latest episode during the history of this great Nation when government officials have persecuted ethnic and religious minorities during periods of national crisis. In the past the Court has not always protected weak and unpopular groups from the unconstitutional and capricious exercise of power by government officials citing the imperatives of national security. See Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944). Yet, as the Court has recently observed, "[t]he laws and Constitution are designed to survive, and remain in force, in extraordinary times. Liberty and security can be reconciled; and in our system they are reconciled within the framework of the law.” Boumediene, 128 S.Ct. at 2277.

Amici respectfully ask the Court to protect the People’s liberty and security within the framework of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 2 recognizes “one form of action known as the civil action.” Fed. R. Civ. P. 2. Federal Rule 8 specifies a notice pleading standard for all civil cases, without exception for those involving claims of national security. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8. The Second Circuit’s “plausibility” standard adequately balances national security interests within a procedural framework that holds even the powerful accountable for violations of the Constitution.

III. Petitioners’ Heightened Pleading Standard Would Adversely Affect a Broad Class of Civil Rights Plaintiffs.

Although Mr. Iqbal’s claims arose under extraordinary circumstances, there is nothing unique about the violations he suffered or his need for judicial recourse. Civil rights litigation has proven to be a necessary bulwark against the use of excessive force, abuse of process and retaliation by federal, state and local officials, especially in circumstances involving supervisory liability. The individuals profiled below are among the many plaintiffs whose claims would likely have been dismissed under a heightened pleading standard applied to civil rights actions in which officials assert the defense of qualified immunity.

Individuals like these would suffer were the Court to overprotect defendants in civil rights cases by adopting the Petitioners' heightened pleading standard.

A. Sara Reedy: Failure to Supervise Officers who Abuse their Authority

Sara Reedy's ordeal shows why structured discovery is necessary in claims against officials supervising police officers who abuse their authority. Reedy was nineteen years old and working the night shift as a cashier at a gas station when she was sodomized by a man holding a gun to her head. Reedy v. Township of Cranberry, 2007 WL 2318084 at *1 (W.D. Pa. 2007). After sexually assaulting her, her assailant ordered her at gunpoint to remove money from the gas station's safe and rip the phone lines from the wall. After her assailant left, Reedy fled the station and sought assistance. Id. at *1.

Unfortunately for Reedy, the police appeared less interested in apprehending her assailant than accusing her of the theft. After Reedy provided the police with information regarding the robbery and sexual assault, she was taken to the hospital where she was treated and evidence of the sexual assault was gathered. While Reedy was at the hospital, Officer Frank Evanson formed the opinion that Reedy had fabricated the story and stolen the money in order to support a heroin habit. While Reedy was still receiving treatment in the hospital, Evanson accused her of faking the sexual assault and committing the theft herself. Without a warrant or informed consent, Evanson ordered a toxicology screen of Reedy's blood. Id. at *1-2.

When Reedy gave a detailed statement to the police a few days later, she included a description of Evanson's inappropriate behavior at the hospital. After Reedy gave her statement, Officers Evanson and Meyer visited Reedy at her home and attempted to intimidate her into admitting she had fabricated the sexual assault and theft. The Officers threatened both Reedy and her husband. Reedy refused to recant, whereupon Evanson promised to return with a warrant for her arrest. Id. at *2.

Evanson obtained an arrest warrant against Reedy, charging that she had made a false report to law enforcement, committed theft by unlawful taking and had received stolen property. When Reedy, now four months pregnant, became aware of the warrant a few days later, she turned herself in. At her preliminary hearing, Evanson testified that Reedy was a flight risk, despite the fact that she had no serious criminal record, little money and was pregnant. After bond was set at $5,000, she served five days in jail while awaiting a bail reduction hearing. Her husband was forced to sell many of their possessions in an attempt to make bail. Id.

One month before Reedy's trial was to begin, Wilber Cyrus Brown was arrested while in the process of committing a robbery and attempting to sexually assault another convenience store clerk. The suspect subsequently confessed to a series of sexual assaults, including the attack upon Reedy. Karen Kane, Butler County's Tax Dollars Hard at Work, PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE, 28 Feb. 2007 at 1; Karen Kane, Assault Victims' Lawsuit to Delay Prosecution of Assailant, PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE, 17 Aug. 2007 at 1. Although the charges against Reedy were then dropped, Reedy had already lost her job, was forced to drop out of school and been deeply traumatized by the police harassment and intimidation as well her incarceration. Reedy, 2007 WL 2318084 at *2 (quoting Compl. at ¶¶53-62).

Reedy brought an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against Officers Evanson and Meyer, their supervisor Steve Mannell, and the District Attorney of Butler County, Pennsylvania, as well as Butler County itself alleging false imprisonment, unlawful detention, malicious prosecution and harm to her liberty interest in violation of the Fifth Amendment. Id. at *1. At least with respect to malicious prosecution, Reedy's claims were strong enough that Butler County reached a financial settlement with her outside of court. Id. at *1.

Evanson, Meyers and Mannell moved to dismiss the complaint under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). Defendant Mannell asserted the defense of qualified immunity and alleged that Reedy had not pleaded sufficiently detailed facts to show his personal involvement in the violation of her constitutional rights. Id. at *5. In rejecting Mannell's motions to dismiss, District Judge Cercone highlighted the problem of asymmetric information faced by civil rights plaintiffs like Sara Reedy. Judge Cercone found that Reedy had

. . . a well-founded basis for the general allegations of the claim based on information and belief, but is not capable of detailing specific allegations against the defendant because such information is exclusively within the possession and control or knowledge of the defendant. If the plaintiff does not have access to such specific information about the defendant's behavior because discovery is the only avenue by which the plaintiff could learn about the defendant's specific undertakings, the plaintiff cannot be expected to allege anything more than what was in the original complaint.

Id. at *7 (emphasis added). Judge Cercone next emphasized the necessity of limited discovery in cases of qualified immunity. "Only some form of discovery could satisfactorily verify the veracity of Mannell's factual assertion . . . Thus, to foreclose a § 1983 claim on the defense without even so much as the ability to explore that distinct possibility would run the risk of elevating the defense to a level of protection far beyond its intended purpose." Id. at *8. In reaching the decision to allow limited discovery, Judge Cercone employed a plausibility standard: "It is reasonable to infer that detectives and officers often confer with and seek guidance and direction from their supervisors, particularly in challenging or high profile cases." Id. at *8.

Judge Cercone rejected Mannell's motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. In balancing Reedy's constitutional rights against the defense of qualified immunity, Judge Cercone permitted limited discovery against the defendant police officers with respect to their interactions with their superiors and allowed Reedy to amend her complaint on the basis of that discovery. Because Judge Cercone allowed limited and structured discovery, Reedy obtained the information necessary to amend her complaint to include specific factual allegations regarding Mannell's personal involvement in the violation of her constitutional rights. Reedy v. Evan-son, Am. Complaint, Civ. No. 2:06-cv-01080-DSC (Mar. 12, 2008). In particular, she made detailed allegations that Mannell had personally consulted upon the investigation of her case and condoned the officers' conduct.

Sara Reedy's case illustrates that controlled discovery is essential to vindicating civil rights violations. Only with limited and structured discovery was Reedy able to determine what role Mannell played as policy maker and supervisor and the extent of his involvement in the violation of her constitutional rights. The Second Circuit's standard allows for the limited discovery which provided for Reedy's remedy. The Petitioners' standard would block such discovery. Had Petitioners' proposed heightened fact pleading standard been required to overcome Mannell's defense of qualified immunity, Sara Reedy would have been deprived of the opportunity to pursue a remedy for the violation of her constitutional rights.

B. George Jones: Unconstitutional Policies and Practices in Criminal Investigations

George Jones was a senior at Fenger High School in Chicago approaching graduation in May 1981. Jones, the son of a local policeman and the editor of his school newspaper, planned to join the Air Force and then attend college. Jones v. City of Chicago, 856 F.2d 985 (7th Cir. 1988).

Jones' dreams were shattered as the result of a terrible tragedy. Only one block from his house, 12-year-old Sheila Pointer was raped and beaten to death on May 4, 1981. The assailant also beat Sheila's 10-year-old brother Purvy unconscious. Detectives Houtsma and Tosello questioned Purvy just as he was emerging from a coma. Based upon equivocal and conflicting statements from Purvy, the police searched the neighborhood and settled upon George Jones, even though he did not match the description. Id. at 988. Detectives went to George's high school and arrested him in his classroom. They brought him to the police station and "threatened him with the electric chair if he didn't confess." Id. at 989. Despite the threats, Jones denied any involvement with the crime.

The following day, a grand jury indicted Jones for murder and rape based on a factual record riddled with fabrications and omissions. Id. at 990. The official arrest report, signed by supervisor Sergeant Palmer, falsely stated that Jones' father told officers that he had not seen his son the morning of the murder and left out key information such as that Purvy had indicated that the assailant was a gang member and that he had failed to affirmatively identify Jones as the assailant.

After the indictment, a new detective on the case, Detective Laverty, uncovered new evidence. He interviewed Purvy, who for the first time said that there had been two assailants and that they had worn stocking masks and again said the assailant was a gang member. Id. Several months later, a well-known gang-member, "King George," confessed to a strikingly similar murder nearby. Detective Laverty told his supervisors, Commander Deas and Lieutenant Griffith, who was the head of the violent crimes unit of the area detective division, that the police had charged the wrong person. Laverty wrote in a report that he believed that "King George," not Jones, was the murderer, but his superiors never forwarded it to state prosecutors. Commander Deas later lied to Laverty that the charges had been dropped in light of the contradictory evidence. Id. at 990.

Subject to a police department policy of keeping "street files," all of the exculpatory evidence was excluded from the official file and remained hidden from prosecutors or defense counsel. The street files were essentially shadow files of the official investigatory files handed over to prosecutors and contained informal notes and memos, whereas the official files contained only the final reports. As a result, the street files were not available to defense counsel even if they contained exculpatory material. For Jones, that meant that his lawyer had only Sergeant Palmer's official report – riddled with falsehoods and omissions – and his lawyer never learned the full accounts of the various conflicting witness statements or Detective Lavery's discoveries. Id. at 989.

In the spring of 1982, Detective Lavery was shocked to learn that George Jones was standing trial for the rape and murder of Sheila Pointer. Lavery contacted Jones' lawyer to tell him about the exculpatory information secreted in the "street files." The lawyer told the trial judge, who declared a mistrial. Shortly afterward the state's attorney dropped all charges against Jones. No apology was ever made to Jones, and neither the City nor the state offered to compensate him for his ordeal. Id. at 991.

Following the mistrial, Jones briefly attended a community college, but quit "amid harassment that included finding a piece of paper bearing the word 'murderer' taped to his locker." Fred Marc Biddle & Maurice Possley, City Fined $800,000 in Arrest Suit, CHI. TRIB., Mar. 6, 1987 at 1, available at 1987 WLNR 1399493. Jones continued to be plagued by ongoing post traumatic stress disorder and the recurring nightmare of being executed while his parents looked on. Having abandoned his early dreams of joining the Air Force and going to college, he ultimately moved to Detroit and worked as an exotic dancer. Id.

Jones sued the City of Chicago and several officers, including supervisors Commander Deas, Lieutenant Griffith, and Sergeant Palmer, under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for false arrest, false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and malicious prosecution, as well as conspiracy to commit these wrongs. He alleged that the defendants' conduct had denied him due process of law under the Fourteenth Amendment and violated his rights under the common law of Illinois. A jury awarded him $801,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. Id. at 992.

In challenging the verdict on appeal, the defendants argued there was insufficient evidence of their personal participation as supervisors. Judge Posner of the Seventh Circuit agreed that “[t]he least extensive participations were those of the supervisory officers,” but nonetheless held that “[t]here was, however, enough evidence to enable the jury to infer that Deas, Griffith, and Palmer had known every false step taken by the subordinate officers, had approved every false step, and had done their part to make the scheme work. . . .” Id. at 992, 993.

Police never solved Sheila Pointer's murder. And none of the officers involved were ever disciplined. Id. at 991. The only person to face disciplinary charges was Detective Laverty – the whistleblower who revealed the “street files” policy – charges that were quietly dropped.

In the absence of discovery, plaintiffs do not have access to and therefore cannot allege the specific details of the police investigations which deprived them of their rights. Discovery was necessary to reveal the ways in which police detectives suppressed exculpatory evidence and their officers set policies that led directly to constitutional violations. By requiring Jones to allege greater factual detail in order to overcome the supervisors' qualified immunity, the heightened pleading standards proposed by the Petitioners, would have wrongly allowed them to escape liability for the tragedy that befell George Jones.

C. Carlos Gutierrez-Rodriguez: Failure to Supervise Violent Subordinates

The tragedy of Carlos Gutierrez-Rodriguez illustrates the importance of discovery in establishing the liability of police officials for the constitutional violations of habitually violent officers under their command. Gutierrez was 22 years old when undercover narcotic officers shot and permanently paralyzed him. Gutierrez-Rodriguez v. Cartagena, 882 F.2d 553 (1st Cir. 1989). Prior to the shooting, Gutierrez was regularly employed in Puerto Rico and planning on attending university. On the evening of December 9, 1983, Gutierrez was sitting in his car in the mountains above San Juan, admiring the view of the city with his girlfriend, when an unmarked vehicle approached them. Four plainclothes narcotics officers, led by Pedro Soto exited the unmarked vehicle and approached Gutierrez' car, their guns drawn. Upon seeing the unidentified gunmen approaching his car, Gutierrez hastily started to drive away. Without warning the police officers began to fire at Gutierrez and his girlfriend. One of the bullets struck Gutierrez in the back, damaging his spinal cord and permanently paralyzing him from the waist down. Id. at 557.

Gutierrez brought an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against Soto and the other three plainclothes officers who fired upon him, as well as against Domingo Alvarez, the director of the narcotics division and Desiderio Cartagena, the police superintendent. The jury found that the defendants had violated Carlos's constitutional right to due process and awarded him $4.5 million in compensatory damages jointly and severally against all defendants, as well as hundreds of thousands in punitive damages, including $225,000 against Alvarez and $150,000 against Cartagena. Id. at 557-58.

The jury's finding of supervisory liability by Alvarez and Cartagena was affirmed by the First Circuit, which held that the deliberate indifference by Alvarez and Cartagena caused Gutierrez' injuries. The court found that as Soto's supervisor, Alvarez was aware of Soto's long history of using excessive force against civilians and Soto's general reputation for violence. Id. at 562. Soto had more complaints against him for brutality than any officer in the narcotics division. Just a few months prior to the shooting of Gutierrez, Soto had been suspended for five days for holding a physician at gunpoint while officers under his command beat the doctor. Despite his concerns about Soto, including his fear that Soto's violence could spark a riot, Alvarez took no action against Soto such as assigning him to a desk, requesting his transfer or restricting his leadership role. Id. at 563.

In affirming Cartagena's supervisory liability, the First Circuit held that the evidence was sufficient for the jury to find that Cartagena was aware of Soto's history of violent and illegal behavior and that Cartagena employed a wholly inadequate and impotent disciplinary system which made it possible for officers like Soto to engage in unconstitutional conduct with impunity. Superintendent Cartagena was responsible for establishing police department policies and procedures and to ensure that these policies and procedures were implemented. Cartagena had the sole authority to suspend or fire an officer. Nonetheless, Cartagena dismissed 12 of 13 civilian complaints against Soto. Moreover, Cartagena refused to consider an officer's past conduct when evaluating complaints of misconduct, thus rendering himself willfully blind to patterns of misconduct. Id. at 565-66.

Absent discovery, Gutierrez would never have been able to adequately allege the specific policy-making and implementation roles of Alvarez and Cartagena or their knowledge of Soto's history of violent and illegal conduct. Gutierrez would have had no access to the information which revealed Alvarez's and Cartagena's repeated failure to sanction or discipline Soto, the very facts necessary to specify how these supervisors were deliberately indifferent to the violation of Carlos Gutierrez' constitutional rights.

The Second Circuit's standard would have permitted the discovery necessary to remedy constitutional violations by supervisory officers against plaintiffs like Carlos Gutierrez-Rodriguez. Yet under the heightened pleading standard proposed by Petitioners, Gutierrez' complaint against Alvarez and Cartagena would have been dismissed for failing to allege the very facts that were later uncovered during discovery. Petitioners' proposed pleading standard would have left Carlos Gutierrez-Rodriguez without any remedy against Alvarez and Cartagena, and would have enabled defendants to escape accountability for their unconstitutional actions.

D. Annabelle Lipsett: Supervisory Indifference to Sexual Harassment

The case of Annabelle Lipsett exemplifies the difficulties faced by plaintiffs suffering discrimination in the school or workplace. Lipsett was repeatedly sexually harassed while a surgical resident at the San Juan, Puerto Rico VA Hospital. Lipsett v. University of Puerto Rico, 864 F.2d 881 (1st Cir. 1988). Her fellow residents and supervisors continually made clear their views that women should not be surgeons, made sexual remarks about her in her presence, and publicly displayed sexually explicit drawings of the plaintiff's body. Lipsett was warned not to complain about the harassment or else she would be dismissed from the residency program. Two of her superiors, Dr. Rehuel Rivera and Dr. Luis Morales, offered to alleviate Lipsett's harassment if she had sex with them. When Lipsett rejected their propositions, Drs. Rivera and Morales became hostile. Id. at 887-88.

Dr. Rivera subsequently retaliated against Lipsett by assigning her work typical for first year residents, but was viewed as punishment for second year residents such as Lipsett. When Lipsett complained, Dr. Rivera increased the amount of work. Lipsett subsequently appealed to Dr. Roberto Novoa, who further retaliated against Lipsett for resisting the orders, by increasing her punishment. Despite raising the issue of the punishment and discussing the general pattern of harassment with the directors of the department of surgery, Dr. Gonzalez and Dr. Blanco, no action was taken to ameliorate conditions. Rather, further retaliation ensued when her male supervisors filed false complaints against her. Acting on the basis of these complaints, which they knew were retaliatory, Drs. Gonzalez, Blanco and Pedro Santiago, Dean of the Medical School, dismissed Lipsett from the residency program. Id. at 888-92.

Lipsett brought action under Title IX and 42 U.S.C. § 1983 alleging she was discriminated against because of her sex. She alleged that Drs. Gonzalez, Blanco and Santiago, were liable for the discrimination and harassment she faced due to their gross negligence. A jury returned a $525,000 verdict for Lipsett against the defendants, including those liable as supervisors. Lipsett v. University of Puerto Rico, 759 F. Supp. 40 (D. Puerto Rico 1991). The supervisory defendants sought to overturn the verdict against them on the basis of qualified immunity. In upholding the jury's verdict, the District Court found that there was an affirmative link between the defendants' deliberate indifference and the violation of Lipsett's rights. Id. at 56.

In rejecting an earlier motion for summary judgment submitted by the supervisory defendants, the First Circuit held that there was sufficient evidence the defendants were aware that the disciplinary actions taken against Lipsett were pretextual and retaliatory. Lipsett v. University of Puerto Rico, 864 F.2d 881, 903 (1st Cir. 1988). The First Circuit further found that Lipsett had presented sufficient facts to establish that Drs. Blanco and Gonzalez failed to investigate or remedy the sexual harassment she faced and that Drs. Blanco, Gonzalez, and Santiago had relied upon the pretextual complaints in their decision to terminate her. Id. at 903. Yet Lipsett presented these facts only after discovery. Without discovery Lipsett could not have known what investigative or disciplinary action was taken by the supervisory defendants or their knowledge that the complaints against her were made on a discriminatory basis.

The case of Annabelle Lipsett shows the necessity of discovery in civil rights cases alleging the deliberate indifference of supervisors to sexual discrimination and harassment. Under the standard articulated by the Second Circuit, Lipsett would have been able to conduct the discovery necessary to determine what knowledge Drs. Blanco, Gonzalez, and Santiago possessed regarding the actions of their subordinates and what actions these supervisors took or failed to take. But the heightened pleading standard proposed by Petitioners would have immunized civil rights violators for their illegal actions and prevented Anabelle Lipsett from holding these supervisors liable for violating her constitutional rights.

Civil rights litigation is a crucial tool to protect fundamental rights, and carefully managed discovery permits the full and fair enforcement of those rights. Petitioners' proposed departure from traditional pleading standards and undue restriction of judicial discretion to manage discovery would put plaintiffs in an intolerable Catch-22. As the cases above illustrate, in too many common situations, Petitioners' heightened pleading standard would systematically disadvantage civil rights plaintiffs and unfairly immunize civil rights violators.

CONCLUSION

This Court should not require a heightened standard of pleading either to defeat the defense of qualified immunity or to allege supervisory liability for the violation of Constitutional rights. The Second Circuit's "flexible plausibility" standard far better guides district court discretion to balance defendants' need for full notice against plaintiffs' need for full discovery. For the foregoing reasons, Amici respectfully request that the Court uphold the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

The Asian American Justice Center (AAJC) is a national, nonprofit, nonpartisan organization dedicated to advancing the human and civil rights of Asian Americans and others through advocacy, policy, public education, and litigation. We are among the nation's leading experts on discrimination and immigrant rights issues. The detention and mistreatment of thousands of Arabs, Muslims, and South Asians after 9/11 resembles that of Japanese Americans during World War II. Given that Asian Americans continue to be impacted by discriminatory policies, AAJC is committed to pursuing accountability at our highest levels of government.

The Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund (AALDEF), founded in 1974, is a national organization that protects and promotes the civil rights of Asian Americans. By combining litigation, advocacy, education, and organizing, AALDEF works with Asian American communities across the country to secure human rights for all. AALDEF in its various civil rights litigations has sought to hold the ultimate decision-makers responsible for the unlawful actions charged in the lawsuits. The petitioners' position, herein, would set back civil rights enforcement by effectively limiting those actions to the persons who often do not themselves make the decisions to violate the civil rights of others, but who are merely "following orders."

The Bill of Rights Defense Committee's mission is to promote, organize, and support a diverse, effective, national grassroots movement to restore and protect civil rights and liberties guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. Our purpose is to educate people about the significance of those rights in our lives; to encourage widespread civic participation; and to cultivate and share the organizing tools and strategies needed for people to convert their concern, outrage, and fear into debate and action to restore Bill of Rights protections. We want to ensure that diverse plaintiffs continue to have access to an independent judiciary in order to enforce rights.

CASA de Maryland, Inc., the state's oldest and largest immigrants' rights organization, provides social, medical, educational, legal and advocacy services to immigrants from around the world. Through its work, CASA seeks to protect the rights and dignity of all human beings regardless of immigration status.

The Center for Justice and Accountability (CJA) is a San Francisco-based human rights organization dedicated to deterring torture and other severe human rights abuses through litigation, education and outreach. CJA uses litigation to hold perpetrators individually accountable for human rights abuses and to advance the rule of law. CJA has been counsel on many human rights cases against former foreign government officials. CJA has an interest in ensuring the correct application of immunity standards for government officials. CJA also has an interest in civil pleading standards which may limit victims ability to obtain discovery necessary to establish official responsibility for unlawful conduct.

The Center for Public Representation is a public interest law firm that has been assisting people with disabilities for over thirty-five years. It is both a state and a nationwide legal center that provides assistance and support to public and private attorneys who represent people with disabilities, as well as federally funded protection and advocacy agencies in each of the fifty States. It routinely seeks preliminary injunctions on behalf of persons with disabilities to ensure that their constitutional rights, including their right to life-sustaining care, are protected.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations is a national organization with headquarters in Washington D.C. and 35 offices across the United States and in Canada. CAIR's mission is to enhance understanding of Islam, encourage dialogue, protect civil liberties, empower American Muslims, and build coalitions that promote justice and mutual understanding. This case highlights CAIR's core values, specifically our commitment to protecting the civil rights of all Americans, regardless of faith or nationality; oppose domestic policies that limit civil rights or permit racial, ethnic or religious profiling, infringe on due process, or that prevent Muslims and others from participating fully in American civic life; and support religious or secular groups that advocate justice and human rights.

Disability Rights Oregon (DRO) is a federally funded law office charged with protecting the rights of people with disabilities. It is part of a network of disability rights offices in all 50 states, the District of Columbia and federal territories. DRO legal staff provide, inter alia, representation in individual and class action lawsuits in federal court, often naming the Governor and the Director of the Department of Human Services. Establishing the participation of these high level officials in development of policy that results in violation of clients' civil and constitutional rights is key to both establishing liability and ensuring that any settlement reached will be effective and enforceable. DRO therefore has an interest in ensuring that it can prevail in its cases by obtaining the discovery necessary to hold high level officials liable.

Equal Rights Advocates (ERA) is a San Francisco-based human rights organization whose mission is to secure and protect equal rights and economic opportunities for women and girls through litigation and advocacy. ERA has litigated historically important civil rights cases in both state and federal courts since it was founded in 1974, including Geduldig v. Aiello, 417 U.S. 484 (1974) and Richmond Unified School District v. Berg, 434 U.S. 158 (1977), and has appeared as amicus curiae in scores of state and federal civil rights matters involving the interpretation and application of procedural and substantive laws affecting the access to justice. The issues raised in this case are of vital import to ERA, particularly with respect to our client base of students and employees who experience discriminatory practices and policies instituted at the highest levels of their educational and corporate institutions, whose efforts to seek justice under our remedial statutes would be frustrated by heightened pleading standards in actions involving supervisory liability.

Equal Justice Society (EJS) is a national civil rights organization comprised of lawyers, scholars, advocates and citizens that seeks to protect fundamental human rights and promote enduring social change through law and public policy, public education and research. The primary mission of EJS is to combat the continuing scourge of racial discrimination and inequality in America. Specifically, EJS works to ensure that antidiscrimination law and jurisprudence continues to adequately address racial and societal inequities. Consistent with that mission, EJS advocates on behalf of individuals whose constitutional rights have been violated by the action and inaction of officials and other decision-makers. In joining amici, EJS urges the Court to protect the ability of individual plaintiffs to seek legal redress for unconstitutional policies and actions.

The Fair Immigration Reform Movement (FIRM) is a national coalition of grassroots organizations fighting for immigrant rights at the local, state and federal level.

The Idaho Community Action Network (ICAN) is committed to economic, social, and racial justice for all. Our mission is to provide a voice for Idahoans committed to progressive social change and to develop the power necessary to create those changes. ICAN is interested in this case because we believe in protecting our civil rights. An infringement on one person's or one group's civil rights has ramifications for all of us.

LatinoJustice PRLDEF is an independent national nonprofit civil rights litigation and advocacy organization which has defended the constitutional rights, civil rights and the equal protection of all Latinos under law. Since 1972, PRLDEF's mission has been to promote civic participation, to cultivate Latino leaders, and to promote voting rights, employment opportunity, fair housing, language rights, educational access, and, immigrants rights.

The Law Foundation of Silicon Valley is a private nonprofit corporation that sponsors five free legal services and advocacy programs, including Public Interest Law Firm (PILF), which has a strong interest in the outcome of this matter. The Law Foundation of Silicon Valley is located in and provides free legal services in Santa Clara County, California. PILF's mission is to protect the civil rights of individuals and groups who are underrepresented in the civil justice system through class action and impact litigation. PILF focuses its efforts on behalf of individuals with disabilities, youth, elders, people who are frequent victims of illegal discrimination and people who have low incomes. Were the heightened pleading standard urged by Petitioners in this action to become law, many of these and other important and meritorious civil rights actions pursued by PILF would be inappropriately threatened with dismissal at an early stage of the case. Thus, the outcome of the instant matter is of intense importance to PILF and its clients.

Maryland Disability Law Center (MDLC) is the federally designated protection and advocacy organization for the state of Maryland. MDLC is a nonprofit organization charged with advancing and protecting the legal rights of persons with disabilities. MDLC has filed several §1983 civil rights cases on behalf of persons with mental or developmental disabilities against state hospitals or institutions. As private attorneys' general, MDLC must determine whether there is sufficient legal basis to allege violation of rights against state actors based on claims reported by clients. The claims involve abuse, neglect and failure to provide a constitutionally adequate standard of care. State institutions are not open to the public. Their operations are protected from scrutiny under the rubrics of patient privacy and medical peer review. Persons committed to state facilities face inordinate obstacles to bringing a legal action against their wardens. MDLC has brought suits against state officials that has resulted in the referral of multiple criminal charges against staff for assault of patients; imposition of new processes to track complaints of abuse and neglect; and improvements in health care. Information obtained through discovery has been vital to obtaining full and appropriate injunctive relief for clients. MDLC's interest in the pleading standard related to qualified immunity may be illustrated in the example of an action against state officials on behalf of a fifteen year old patient who was raped by staff at the state facility for youth with mental disabilities. Prior to discovery it was not known that a criminal background check had not been conducted on the staff or that ten other minor patients had made complaints of inappropriate sexual conduct by the same staff person. If pleading standards are altered from existing Federal Rules, the system wide relief that MDLC prioritizes for its clients will be tremendously diminished, not due to a lesser need for broad based systemic relief, but due to a lesser ability to join those state officials tasked with general administrative functions and control.

The Maurice & Jane Sugar Law Center for Economic & Social Justice (Sugar Law Center) has both a strong interest in the litigation and expertise in the matter at bar. The Sugar Law Center is a Detroit-based national nonprofit, public-interest law center affiliated with the National Lawyers Guild. Since its founding in 1991, the SLC has pursued justice through the dissemination of information, advocating changes in existing legislation, and through the litigation of cases. The organization seeks to promote a greater understanding of civil and human rights. Sugar Law directly assists individuals who depend on having meaningful access in the judicial system to litigate core Constitutional rights and to hold companies and governmental bodies and agents accountable for violating their rights.

The Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund (MALDEF) is a national civil rights organization established in 1968. Its principal objective is to promote the civil rights of Latinos living in the United States through litigation, advocacy, and education.

The Michigan & Detroit National Lawyers Guild has a strong interest in the litigation and expertise in the matter at bar. The Michigan & Detroit NLG is a statewide association of attorneys and legal workers. Among its members, are numerous civil rights attorneys. The organization seeks to advance greater recognition of persons' human rights within the political and legal system, including the rights of individuals to have direct access to justice when these rights are violated. Michigan & Detroit NLG members have litigated hundreds of cases involving the rights of persons to be free from discrimination, unlawful arrests and imprisonment, and the right to hold governmental bodies and agents accountable for violation of these rights.

The National Asian Pacific American Bar Association (NAPABA) is the national association of Asian Pacific American attorneys, judges, law professors and law students. NAPABA represents the interests of over 40,000 attorneys and approximately 57 local Asian Pacific American bar associations. Its members include solo practitioners, large firm lawyers, corporate counsel, legal service and nonprofit attorneys, and lawyers serving at all levels of government. Since NAPABA's inception in 1988, it has promoted justice, equity and opportunity for Asian Pacific Americans, as the national voice for Asian Pacific Americans in the legal profession. These efforts have included civil rights advocacy on various fronts. NAPABA joins amici to protect the ability of litigants to pursue judicial remedies to hold government officials accountable for setting unconstitutional policies and condoning constitutional violations by subordinates, including misconduct motivated by racial animus.

The National Center for Lesbian Rights (NCLR) is a national legal organization committed to advancing the human and civil rights of the lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender community through litigation, public policy advocacy, and public education. Since its inception in 1977, NCLR has worked to ensure that all persons receive the protections of the basic civil liberties guaranteed by the United States Constitution, and thus has a particular interest in the rejection of a heightened pleading standard in civil rights and civil liberties cases involving supervisory liability. NCLR is interested in this case because the rights at issue are fundamental for all people and their infringement by the government poses a serious risk to the dignity and freedom of all.

For over thirty years, the National Health Law Program (NHLP) has engaged in legal and policy analysis on behalf of low income people, people with disabilities, the elderly and children. NHeLP has provided legal representation, conducted research and policy analysis on issues affecting the health status and health access of these groups. We work to help consumers and their advocates overcome barriers to health care, including a lack of affordable services or access to health care providers. The Program's work includes enforcement of the Americans with Disabilities Act, and our work and clients could therefore be affected by the Court's decision in this case.

The National Immigrant Justice Center, a partner of Heartland Human Care Services, is dedicated to ensuring human rights protections and access to justice for all immigrants, refugees and asylum seekers. NIJC provides direct legal services to and advocates for these populations through policy reform, impact litigation, and public education.

The National Immigration Law Center (NILC) is a nonprofit national legal advocacy organization whose mission is to protect and promote the rights and opportunities of low-income immigrants and their family members. Ensuring that immigrants are treated fairly and that their rights are respected in the course of government enforcement of immigration law is a priority for the organization. Because the outcome of this case may affect the ability of low-income immigrants to obtain redress for violations of their rights, NILC has a fundamental interest in this case.

The National Korean American Service & Education Consortium (NAKASEC) was founded in 1994 by local community centers seeking to empower and improve the lives of Korean Americans, as a part of a greater goal of building a national movement for social change. Our affiliates provide programs in education, social services, culture, civic engagement and organizing that address the full human & political needs of community members. Our mission is to project a national progressive voice on major civil rights and immigrant rights issues and promote the full participation of Korean Americans in American society.

The National Law Center on Homelessness & Poverty (NLCHP) is a nonprofit organization based in Washington, D.C., established in 1989 to advocate for homeless and low-income people nationwide. Through litigation, policy advocacy and public education, NLCHP works to promote, preserve, and enforce the civil and constitutional rights of homeless and low-income people, who are frequently without effective political voice or power. NLCHP has been involved in litigation in a number of different civil rights contexts, such as challenges to mistreatment of homeless persons by local governments and police departments, challenges to barriers to voting by homeless people, and efforts to ensure that homeless people are afforded the protections of the federal Fair Housing Act.

The National Police Accountability Project (NPAP) was founded in 1999 by members of the National Lawyers Guild (NLG), the first racially integrated national bar association. NPAP was founded with the intent of helping to end police abuse of authority and to provide support for grassroots and victims' organizations combating police misconduct. NPAP has nearly 400 members across the country. The project provides training and support for attorneys and legal workers; public education and information on issues relating to police misconduct; information and resources for nonprofit and community groups who work with victims of police abuse; support for legislative reform efforts aimed at raising the level of police accountability; and a forum for legal professionals and community organizations to come together and creatively work to end police misconduct.

One of the important missions of NPAP is to promote the accountability of police officers, and their supervisors and employers for violations of the Constitution or laws of the United States. Demanding heightened pleading standards in civil rights and civil liberties cases involving supervisory liability would have long-reaching implications and would diminish the ability of plaintiffs to hold supervisors accountable for constitutional and statutory violations.

The National Women's Law Center (NWLC) is a nonprofit legal advocacy organization dedicated to the advancement and protection of women's rights and the corresponding elimination of sex discrimination from all facets of American life. Since 1972, the NWLC has worked to secure equal opportunity for women through full enforcement of their constitutional and statutory rights. It has filed and participated in numerous amicus briefs before this Court.

New York Lawyers for the Public Interest (NYLPI) is a nonprofit public interest law firm founded in 1976. Staff attorneys engage in advocacy and litigation in the areas of disability rights, access to healthcare, and environmental issues on behalf of disadvantaged and underrepresented people throughout New York City. NYLPI has an interest in both the standards for establishing immunity for governmental officials and civil pleading standards. The question of whether heightened pleading standards apply has recently been raised during the course of NYLPI's litigation.

The Northwest Women's Law Center, based in Seattle, Washington, is a nonprofit public interest legal organization that works to advance the legal rights of women in the Pacific Northwest through litigation, education, legislative advocacy, and the provision of legal information and referral services. Since its founding in 1978, the Law Center has been dedicated to protecting and securing equal rights for women and their families, including in the workplace, in educational institutions, in prison, and elsewhere. Toward that end, the Law Center has participated as counsel and as amici curiae in cases throughout the Northwest and the country, including bringing suit on behalf of women inmates in Alaska for equal access to programs and services offered to male inmates and representing incarcerated women in Washington receiving inadequate health care. The Law Center is currently involved in numerous legislative and litigation efforts to protect and expand civil rights. The Law Center continues to serve as a regional expert and leading advocate on women's civil rights issues.

The South Asian Bar Association of Northern California (SABA-NC) is a nonprofit, membership-supported organization of lawyers working to advance the interests of South Asian attorneys within the legal profession, and the interests of South Asian communities in the broader U.S. community. Among SABA-NC's goals as a bar association is to ensure that individuals of South Asian origin in the United States enjoy the greatest possible protection of their civil rights under the law. SABA-NC and its over 400 members therefore have a strong interest in the legal standards applicable to claims of government immunity asserted by supervisory defendants in civil rights litigation alleging violation of fundamental constitutional rights. Application of the heightened pleading standard urged by Petitioners would render it more difficult for South Asian civil rights plaintiffs in Northern California to assert legal claims concerning civil rights violations designed and implemented at the highest ranks of government. As the largest regional organization of South Asian lawyers in the United States, whose work has included advocating the interest of numerous individuals alleging infringement of their constitutional rights in the wake of the post-9/11 law enforcement dragnet targeting individuals of South Asian and Middle Eastern descent within the United States, SABA-NC has a unique perspective on the issue to be determined by this Court. SABA-NC adds its voice to the undersigned amici in this matter who also speak for constituencies who may be negatively impacted by the application of a heightened pleading standard as asserted by Petitioners.

The Southern Coalition for Social Justice is a nonprofit public interest advocacy organization that promotes justice by empowering minority and low-income communities in the South to defend and advance their political, social and economic rights. We participate in litigation on behalf of our clients, seeking redress for violations of their civil rights. Supervisory liability is a crucial component of such cases, and frequently it is difficult for plaintiffs to know the full extent of a supervisor's role in decision-making without the opportunity to use discovery tools in litigation. We have an interest in making sure that our clients' rights are fully protected and oppose a heightened pleading standard for plaintiffs in civil rights cases, particularly for supervisory liability, because it would present a significant barrier to that goal.

The Walter Leitner International Human Rights Clinic of the Leitner Center for International Law and Justice at Fordham Law School in New York City aims to train a new generation of human rights lawyers and to inspire results-oriented, practical human rights work throughout the world. The Leitner Clinic works in partnership with non-governmental organizations and foreign law schools on international human rights projects ranging from legal and policy analysis, fact-finding and report writing, and human rights training and capacity-building.

The World Organization for Human Rights USA (Human Rights USA) is a nonprofit, public interest human rights organization dedicated to ending torture, gender-based violence, and other major human rights abuses, using litigation in the United States as the primary tool for accomplishing these goals. Human Rights USA's staff has extensive experience litigating issues regarding U.S. adherence to international human rights standards, as well as human rights norms incorporated into U.S. domestic law, particularly the Convention Against Torture and its implementing legislation. This litigation has included a number of civil actions under the ATS and the TVPA dealing with corporate accountability, FSIA, and act of state issues. We also were named amicus curiae in the first criminal prosecution under the Convention Against Torture, the case against Chuckie Taylor of Liberia. Human Rights USA is an affiliate of the World Organization Against Torture (Organisation Mondiale Contre La Torture, or "OMCT") network, composed of over 200 similarly situated human rights organizations around the world, each focusing on their own nation's human rights compliance issues and needs.
